The Quality Foster Care Services Act

The Quality Foster Care Services Act (S. 1992) is bipartisan legislation introduced by Senator Tammy Baldwin (D-WI) and Senator Rob Portman (R-OH) that will improve foster care services for thousands of America's most vulnerable youth. This bill clarifies Medicaid policy that affects foster children with special behavioral health needs and/or medical disabilities.

Background on the Quality Foster Care Services Act

Therapeutic Foster Care (often referred to as "Treatment Foster Care" or TFC) is the evidence-informed, trauma-informed, and highly effective placement of children and youth with serious medical, psychological, emotional and social needs. Under the TFC model, foster parents are given special training to address the needs of youths with major mental health challenges and children receive intensive in-home services to sustain them in the community.

TFC provides critical services to approximately 40,000 foster children across the country.¹ The model works to keep its particularly vulnerable youth out of costly and often ineffective institutional care. In addition, it provides needed clinical therapy options to youth in lieu of overmedication.

Despite the clear benefits of TFC, current law does not provide for a standard definition of TFC under Medicaid. Though TFC services are provided across the country—and are reimbursed through Medicaid and other child welfare funding streams—the lack of a federal standard definition impairs TFC quality and access.²

The Quality Foster Care Services Act fixes this problem by establishing a federal Medicaid definition for TFC. This commonsense clarification will promote accountability for states offering TFC, identify financing options, and drive personnel training and standards.

The legislation is endorsed by a significant number of national children's and mental health organizations, including The Alliance for Children and Families, Child Welfare League of America, Children's Defense Fund, First Focus, Foster Family-based Treatment Association, KidsPeace, National Council for Community Behavioral Health, National Foster Care Coalition, and Voice for Adoption.

Bipartisan companion legislation is being introduced in the House of Representatives by Rep. Rosa DeLauro (D-CT) and Rep. Tom Cole (R-OK).

² A 2013 independent study from Boston University found that all 50 states and the District of Columbia offer intensive therapeutic services of some level to foster youth with serious behavioral and/or mental health disorders under various names. The University's research showed that states currently use Medicaid reimbursement to pay for the clinical services associated with these youth's care regardless of the particular name of their state program. Its research also uncovered a significant level of confusion and lack of clarity about TFC across states (as well as within states) and in the broader child welfare field. The University concluded that a critical first step to eliminating the confusion about TFC, and bringing greater clarity to the child welfare field, is the adoption of a federal standard.
